

'I don't want to miss a thing' – your personnel won't with the new sound and light signal tower

Motion 29, the Welsh-based industrial solutions supplier, has brought on board the MP3-compatible signal tower (LKEH) from Patlite to add to its existing product offering. The company partners with Patlite, the leading Japanese manufacturer of information display devices, for its range of signal light towers and audible alarms. This latest product is ideal when a warning light is needed in addition to a spoken voice for an ultra clear warning.

The LKEH has an adjustable volume of up to 105dB at 1 metre and, due to its ultra bright LEDs and 100mm diameter lens, achieves good visibility from great distances, such as in a large factory or work space. The product is energy efficient, consuming less power than an incandescent bulb, is maintenance free and, as with all Patlite goods, promises product longevity.

The LKEH gives you the option to record your own message or use one of the 32 pre-installed sounds; a host of options from a standard chime to a synthesized 'I don't want to miss a thing', allowing personnel to respond to sight as well as sound.

"The LKEH is designed to increase productivity and eliminate downtime", explains Steve Fisher, director at Motion 29. "When a glitch in your machinery can have a serious impact on your turnover, spending less than £380 on the LKEH is a wise investment."
